Improper engine use and maintenance, such as broken piston rings, mixed hard iron in the cylinder, etc., can cause strain on the piston surface. For mild strains, use finer sandpaper or grindstone for polishing; when the strains are severe, the piston must be replaced. If the engine encounters high temperatures or the carbon deposits on the top of the piston are too thick, part of the metal on the piston will stick to the cylinder wall or small molten pits will appear on the top of the piston. The former is called cylinder sticking, and the latter is called ablation. If the strain or ablation is not serious, you can use a grindstone or relatively fine sandpaper to polish the sticking or ablation area. If it is serious, replace the piston. Sometimes the piston will also crack, mostly at the top of the piston or near the piston pin hole where the mechanical load is greater. When the piston breaks, it should be replaced in time to prevent accidents.
