The function of the carburetor is to use the vacuum negative pressure generated by the engine to supply a certain proportion of gasoline and air mixture to the combustion chamber of the engine. The complete combustion of one kilogram of gasoline requires about 15 kilograms of air, so the mixing of oil and gas is very important. In the middle of the channel through which the carburetor draws in air is a narrow throat, which accelerates the air drawn in by the engine, sucks out the fuel in the thin tube, atomizes it, and mixes it with the air. The carburetor usually includes a fuel chamber, a choke, an idle orifice, a main orifice, an air throttle pipe and an accelerator pump.
